Lawmakers Grapple With Transportation Funding Issues

Our elected representatives in both Lansing and Washington have been keeping their noses to the proverbial grindstone in seeking solutions to the challenges of adequately funding our transportation system, whether its strengthening our passenger train and local transit systems, fixing roads, repairing bridges or providing safe places for people to walk and bike.

Before adjourning for the 4th of July holiday break, the Senate approved a $1.5 billion plan to fund Michigan’s transportation needs. In contrast to the plan approved earlier by the House — which has been widely panned as simply moving money around — the Senate plan generates new revenue by increasing the gasoline tax by 15-cents over the next three years. The tax on diesel fuel will rise by 19-cents over that period.

Opponents of the plan are critical of the provision to redirect $700 million in general fund revenue to roads, saying this will force cuts in other budget areas. The plan also includes a mechanism to rollback the personal income tax in any year that general fund growth exceeds inflation.

Although local transit will see a modest increase in funding, the plan “fails to put [all of] the new revenue through the traditional funding formula that supports transit, rail, trails, harbors and the rest of Michigan’s complete transportation system,” according to Chris Kolb, head of the Michigan Environmental Council. This is one of the important issues that will have to be addressed as the House and the Senate work over the summer to reconcile their differences.

Meanwhile the U.S. Senate completed committee action June 25 on two

Coast-to-Coast Passenger Rail Study
Round 2 Public Meetings July 13-23

With the successful completion of the first round of five public engagement meetings, the Michigan By Rail team is feeling pretty good about their efforts. Participants have been enthusiastic and have brought a number of important issues to the forefront. Media coverage has been encouraging.

Liz Treutel, as contract manager for the project, notes that participants are moving beyond “this is where I want to go by train” to the more substantive issues of “how long will it take me to get there,” “what will the fare be,” “how often will the train run.” These issues will be important elements to be considered as the technical consultants assess the feasibility of once again linking Michigan’s major population centers — Detroit-Lansing-Grand Rapids-Holland — with passenger train service.

The second round of public engagement meetings is scheduled for July 13-23. MARP, as a member of the Michigan By Rail team, is hosting this series of meetings, along with the Michigan Environmental Council and the Ann Arbor Area Transportation Authority. See the schedule of events at the right.

Formally titled “Detroit – Holland Passenger Rail Ridership and Cost Estimate Study”, the study is funded by a federal grant with public matching funds provided by 11 organizations and institutions located along the potential corridor. The study is being managed by Michigan Environmental Council through a partnership with the Ann Arbor Area Transit Authority and the Michigan Department of Transportation. The consulting firm, Transportation and Economic Management Systems (TEMS), will complete the technical analysis. The final report is expected by December 2015.

Along with public feedback, the study will also analyze travel patterns, demographic trends, cost estimates and existing conditions of rail infrastructure to determine what, if any, next steps should be taken to examine the possibility for new passenger train service.

For questions or to request special accommodations, please contact Liz Treutel at (517) 487-9539 or liz@environmentalcouncil.org bills vital to both short and longer term funding for Amtrak.

The Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Transportation, Housing and Urban Development has approved a FY2016 spending bill that is a big improvement over House efforts to cut Amtrak funding by $262 million. The subcommittee voted down an amendment offered by Sen. Coons to increase funding to match Amtrak’s budget request of $2 billion (up from the $1.4 billion approved), but the amendment could be reintroduced in the full Senate. In addition, the subcommittee cut $424 million from the Federal Transit Administration account, jeopardizing the New Starts program geared toward initiating and expanding heavy- and light-rail urban transit systems.

Longer term, the Railroad Reform Enhancement and Efficiency Act (RREEA) authorizes spending approximately $1.65 billion annually over the next four years on rail service, as well as $570 million per year on rail grants. Ken Prendergast, All Aboard Ohio, is particularly enthused about Sec. 301, a program for issuing three-year operating assistance grants to launch or restore intercity rail passenger transportation. This could have significance for Michigan’s proposed Coast-to-Coast route.

Train and transit advocates are urged to write to their lawmakers asking them to support funding a strong 21st century national passenger train system.

"Mass rail transit is still the future . . . We can travel at close to a hundred miles an hour while being on our phones, reading books, or just relaxing. Trains can provide Wi-Fi, food, a better environment and introduce us to people we would have never meet if we stayed in our cars. Instead of slowly allowing trains to fade away we need to . . . show people that trains are not the past but are also the transportation of the future."

—Kiefer Weisman, Ball State University student and executive producer of the film "Indiana Crossrails: A Transit Choice." View the film, a blog and a series of public service announcements promoting rail travel on the students’ website IndianaCrossRails.org.

“The May 31 Reuters story in the Duluth News Tribune . . . repeated errors about Amtrak and the issue of “profitability” that really should not appear ever again in public news media.”

—J. Howard Harding, a retired transportation planner and a former director of the National Association of Railroad Passengers, in an article reprinted HERE explaining why he thinks that transportation “profitability” is a myth for Amtrak, airlines or roads.
